ADDENDUM NO. 1

Q1: The specifications call for .060 reinforced membrane (page 11 sub paragraph 1.01) and .060 non-reinforced membrane (page 13 sub-paragraph 2.02). Please verify which type you require.

A1: We would request the reinforced membrane.

Q2: The dormitory roof has an existing three (3) inch polyiso insulation in place, an approximate R-18.0. The specifications are requiring the removal of this material and installing new one and one-half (1 1/2) inch polyiso insulation R-9.0. Do you think that leaving the three (3) inch in place and giving a square foot price to replace wet or damaged insulation would be a better option.

A2: We still request a total tear off of the roof as mentioned in the specifications.

Q3: The kitchen roof is now a mechanically attached (exposed membrane) epdm roof. The specifications call for a new ballasted roof. It would be to your advantage in the life of the roof to have an exposed membrane such as an adhered roof in lieu of installing ballast. The roof membrane would be the same thickness as described in question 1.

A3: We agree with the response of the vendor on question 3 and would request that instead of a ballasted roof on the kitchen, that an adhered .060 reinforced membrane be installed.

Q4: At the kitchen roof, we were informed that it also has three (3) inch polyiso insulation in place and it is to be removed and replace with one and one-half (1 1/2) inch polyiso. It may be a better installation to have a square foot price to replace wet and damaged insulation again and install new one (1) inch insulation over the top of the three (3) inch insulation. This would be for both an adhered or ballasted roof system.
