Vendor Question:

The specification for the exhaust is the horizontal position. This raises a question of extreme exhaust temperature, if this engine goes in the regeneration mode that is required by the EPA and the engine manufactures the exhaust temperature could possible start a fire if this truck is used in a wooded or grass area. All of the engines manufactures have to meet the new guide lines on exhaust.

Agency response:

The exhaust systems for vehicles contained in DNR209104, need to be in a horizontal position, underneath the bed of the truck. No fire danger is anticipated as these vehicles are used primarily on paved, graveled, or dirt roadways.

The trucks will have fish hauling tanks permanently mounted to the beds. Access ladders, recirculation plumbing, and other appurtenances are located at the front of the hauling tank, next to the rear of the cab. A vertical exhaust system will prevent placement of these features. Additionally, fumes from a vertical exhaust system could enter the fish hauling tanks-displacing oxygen needed to keep fish alive. Also, hatchery personnel work from the top of the tank while loading and unloading fish, and would be exposed to breathing exhaust fumes.

For the above reasons, the exhaust systems must be placed horizontally underneath the truck beds.
